I'm constantly being asked why I don't write much about Dollywood, the theme park in Pigeon Forge, TN, and the one I frequent most. It's a good question, and I don't have a good answer. Why? Well, let's just say that in the past, Dollywood has subjected me to some pretty significant abuse. (In my teens, I was actually stalked by a very creepy Dollywood employee.) I have done my best to ignore that history, but as I go back and read old posts about my experiences there, I can't help but be reminded of how difficult it is to ignore those experiences. Today, I want to write about Dollywood, and about what it's like to go there, but also about what Dollywood does and doesn't do that I find appealing and endearing. From my very first visit there, I thought the park was charming and inviting. I had never been there before, and hadn't even seen much of the Smoky Mountains. I'd only ever visited a few other touristy spots in the South, so I was quite impressed. I was also very impressed by how smoothly and happily things were run. I'm still very impressed. The park is a "wilderness" theme park. My older daughter, who had been to Disney World, loved it. I was shocked that she found it so tame. The park is also very much oriented toward families. There are a number of activities for kids of all ages,
